kantola harassment training answers: Anti-Harassment Training Does Not Work Candy Khan, 2022-09-08 No employer wants its employees to be bullied and harassed at the workplace. On the contrary, most employers offer an anti-harassment training to ensure employees understand company policy and legislation on workplace harassment. However, anti-harassment training typically focuses on definitions, rights of employers and employees, and complaint resolution processes. While this information is essential, anti-harassment training fails to allow for an interrogation of participant's social location, positionality, and intersectionality (who am I). Moreover, facilitators often teach anti-harassment via a neutral lens, failing to understand ways in which their identities shape their pedagogy (teaching). Dr. Candy focuses on a whole person approach, where participants could bring their whole self to the workshop (mind, body, emotions, and spirit), which could potentially lead to a transformative shift, moving the information from the head to the heart. A must read for those in the anti-harassment training space.

kantola harassment training answers: Effects of Instructional Strategies on Knowledge and Behavioral Identifications in Sexual Harassment Training Mary Douglass Pilgram, 2014 This field experiment study will evaluate an existing commercially produced online sexual harassment training program in an educational setting and will examine the effects of three instructional strategies on knowledge and behavioral identifications in sexual harassment training for college students. College students completed a written knowledge-based pretest and then received sexual harassment training via one of three content-similar treatment groups: online instruction, face-to-face instruction, or by reading a pamphlet. After training, an equivalent posttest was taken to assess knowledge gain; after watching video vignettes, participants identified sexually harassing behaviors. Three weeks later a follow-up posttest was given to assess knowledge retention. Training did not produce an immediate gain in knowledge scores regardless of training condition. However, reading and face-to-face training conditions predicted the correct answer of case-related questions on the posttest; reading and online training conditions predicted knowledge retention three weeks after the training. From the videos, participants correctly identified 54% of verbal sexual harassment cues; participants over identified 19% of verbal cues as sexual harassment. Participants correctly identified 30% of nonverbal sexual harassment cues; participants over identified 16% of nonverbal cues as sexual harassment. Correct identification of nonverbal sexual harassment cues was higher for females, those with prior sexual harassment training, and those in the face-to-face condition. Implications for future training sessions and future research directions are also discussed.
